I encountered him again.

On a Forest Service trail he had been visiting regularly like it was part of his normal routine.

He hasn't been back since. He knows I recognized him. I now know he's local. I now know he drives a state truck with no identifying agency on it.

This required authorization above the park level. Someone above [Park Supervisor] signed off on this. Which means this isn't one rogue supervisor protecting her position. This is institutional corruption. Coordinated. Deliberate. Directed at a volunteer for doing nothing more than documenting how he was treated.

That's what you most want covered up. That you sent a man after me, alone. And I documented it.

Do you see how disproportionate this was yet? Do you see what it looks like from the outside?

I assume he's told you about the encounter. If he hasn't, you might want to ask him about it.

Lisa,
You never responded to my August 15th letter about the covert operative encounter.
I'm providing supplemental documentation now.
This is the video I recorded immediately after the March 18th encounter - before I understood what it actually was:
Encounter with Assertive Man Ends in Departure

In it, you'll hear me describe:
An assertive man who appeared while I was alone.
Someone who kept asking questions I wouldn't answer.
My interpretation at the time: a failed romantic encounter.
I thought he was interested in me. I thought he struck out because he played power games instead of being authentic.
Six days later, I was removed from my position.
The video proves several things:
I documented the encounter immediately - same day as my email to [Park Supervisor].
I had no paranoia about institutional targeting in the moment. (I wondered, but it seemed so implausible at the time.)
My later recognition of this as a covert probe came from pattern analysis, not conspiracy thinking.
The encounter was designed as bait - and I didn't take it.
The questions from August remain unanswered:
Do those yurt photos exist?
Were they ever published?
Was this encounter logged in your systems?
This supplemental evidence is now part of the permanent record.
The pattern is documented. The timeline is clear. The institutional tactics are visible. And they'll remain so.
I am now working on a supplemental project that will better highlight the volunteer abuse I experienced to future volunteers since you refuse to protect us.
This isn't going away, Lisa.
I have far more evidence than you realize.
Every day you choose silence, the breach deepens.
Why haven't you acted? Why do you allow these abusive tactics to remain a part of your legacy?

Subject: The Setup You Now Own

Lisa,

Four days before I was removed from Honeyman, a man approached me while I was cleaning the yurts.

He was not in uniform. He offered no name. He carried no identification.

He said he was with the park service and that he was taking photos of the yurts — while they were still dirty, mid-clean, with all doors propped open.

Then, without transition, he pressed me — hard and fast — with direct personal questions:
How do you like the park?
How are you being treated here?
Is the leadership treating you well?

This was not casual.
It was not polite.
It was a calculated psychological pressure test, delivered by a stranger while I was isolated and working. And while all the rangers were away for a regional event.

I recognized it in real time. It was disorienting — because it was meant to be. It didn't read like routine oversight. It read like a probe. It read like aggression. When I didn't answer, he asked again — reframed the question, stepped in closer. It was intimate. And it was forced.

I asked [Park Supervisor] about it because I wanted it documented (see attached thread). I understood what this was. She had an immediate justification: he was "from I.T." taking photos for site documentation. She praised how I "handled it."

That wasn't a reassurance. That was a confirmation that I'd been observed and evaluated — and that the probe had failed to elicit the intended response.

Let's name what this was:

There is no public record of these photos ever being used.

There is no traceable operational need for unannounced photo capture during an active clean.

There was no follow-up, no supervisor debrief, no procedural accountability.

Just [Park Supervisor] — tying off the thread as quickly as possible.

It was a setup. It failed.
And within DAYS, I was removed from my role — using a homeless man's journal as pretext.
The irony is grotesque.

So I'll ask directly:

Do those photos exist?

Were they ever published?

Was this encounter logged anywhere in your internal systems?

Because if not, you now have something far worse than negligence.
You have a covert institutional tactic used against a volunteer — followed by a pattern of containment and silence.

Something I endured for two months. I just wanted to get through my time there so I could move onto the other parks in my trajectory. [Park Supervisor] knew that. [Park Manager] knew that. And that's why they were trying so hard to frame me as a problem. It's why they removed me when I only had ONE SHIFT LEFT.

This is what [Park Supervisor] did to someone who was doing his job.
Unpaid. Alone. Professional.

And this is what Allison did in response: nothing.
No inquiry. No accountability. Just silence.

That silence is now part of the record.
And so is this message.

You've left the same people in charge at your flagship campground — even after direct, documented, and now expanded evidence of unethical conduct.

What happened at Honeyman is not behind you.
It is with you now.
And every day you choose not to act becomes part of the breach.

I know you don't want to hear from me. I know the institutional reflex to frame this as obsession. This is not that. I need you to be an ethical leader.

Find a way.

Subject: For the Record - March 20 Field Encounter

Allison,

This email chain may appear mundane on the surface.
It is not.

What it documents is the outer shell of an orchestrated event — a baited encounter that I now know, without doubt, was sent by [Park Supervisor].

A man appeared while I was cleaning. No identification. No uniform.
He claimed to be taking photos of the yurts — which were still dirty, mid-clean, doors propped open.
No one does that. That was the first tell.

He confronted me immediately with invasive, personal questions — not park-related, not procedural.
When I didn't engage, he turned and left quickly.

Later, [Park Supervisor] confirmed he was "with IT" and praised how I "handled it."
That wasn't a compliment. It was a data point. A probe that failed.

This wasn't routine.
It was covert assessment, masked as operations.

And I see now what it was meant to be:
A pretext. A setup.
An attempt to provoke a misstep that could justify my removal.
It didn't work. I didn't take the bait.

This email chain remains — a quiet record of that moment.
You may want to review it with clearer eyes.

Because what happened at that park is larger than policy.
It speaks to the architecture of how authenticity is policed, how nonconformity is treated as threat, and how systems recruit silence to cover their own fractures.

I am not asking for response.
I am not seeking closure.

But I will not let distortion have the last word.

This message is not about me.
It is about what your park service has become.

Thanks, [Park Supervisor]. Hope it's not a problem he took the photos before I'd cleaned them. All three of my sites were in the little alcove so I had all three open at the same time while I moved around all three doing my different tasks. Like, I had the sanitizer going in all three whole I blowed the sites, etc. The trash cans were propping all the doors open. I'd want the photos to look nice of course!

Sam,

Just wanted to let you know I did reach out to the I.T. employee who is spearheading the site photo updates and it was indeed them who was out getting photos of yurts in A loop 😊

Have a great afternoon!

Hi Sam,

We have had some staff from I.T. working on getting updated photos of sites all over the state. I think you handled it wonderfully asking if they had any other questions. It’s not unusual for folks to want to take a look inside especially if they haven’t seen a yurt before. I can follow up with folks in I.T. to see if anyone was out today :)

Hi [Park Supervisor],

I wanted to check in about something from today.

While I was working, a man showed up, said he was with the park service, and started taking photos of the yurts while they were still dirty, since I was in the process of cleaning them. I engaged him briefly —asked if he had any questions—but the interaction felt a little off.

He didn’t introduce himself by name, wasn’t in uniform, and had no visible identification. He only said he was with the park service and that they “needed photos of some of them still.” Then he started asking me questions—how I like the park, how I’m being treated here. It stood out, especially with the timing, since all the rangers were away for meetings.

Was this an official visit that you're aware of? If so, no problem—just seemed a bit odd, and I wasn’t sure if I should have handled it differently. If not, I wanted to flag it in case it’s something to be aware of. Let me know if you have any insight.

Thanks,
Sam
