I encountered him again.

On a Forest Service trail he had been visiting regularly like it was part of his normal routine.

He hasn't been back since. He knows I recognized him. I now know he's local. I now know he drives a state truck with no identifying agency on it.

This required authorization above the park level. Someone above [Park Supervisor] signed off on this. Which means this isn't one rogue supervisor protecting her position. This is institutional corruption. Coordinated. Deliberate. Directed at a volunteer for doing nothing more than documenting how he was treated.

That's what you most want covered up. That you sent a man after me, alone. And I documented it.

Do you see how disproportionate this was yet? Do you see what it looks like from the outside?

I assume he's told you about the encounter. If he hasn't, you might want to ask him about it.

I want to ensure there is no ambiguity here, so I want to clarify that I do not believe the second encounter was premeditated.

He was clearly surprised to see me there. He did not know he jogged a forest trail that was part of my route. He stopped coming immediately after because I was in uniform, in a forest service truck of my own, and he recognized what that meant.

The point is this - I collapsed [Park Supervisor]'s cover story simply by encountering him there.

He is local. He is not IT. He is not in a vehicle that explains his presence a year ago. He is precisely what I have said he was from day one.

A year ago you used that man to intimidate me while everyone was away at a regional event. I documented it. You still have not explained it.

Because you can't. Because it's precisely what it looks like - profound misuse of state resources to intimidate someone with no protection from you as free labor. That abuse is so extreme that you have been completely silent about it from the very beginning.

But now I know who he is.

When I start telling the story of what Oregon State Parks did, I won't lead with "they told me to chew glass and swallow it."

I won't lead with "they put the retaliation in writing."

I won't lead with "their director labeled my documentation emotional processing."

Each of those would be devastating on its own. Each of those would be enough.

But I'll lead with this.

"They sent a man after me while I was isolated and alone, believing they could intimidate me into silence — after I had already recorded them abusing their positions of authority. They did this to someone with no institutional protection, no recourse, no way of sounding an alarm. They sent a man to intimidate someone with integrity. Because they had none."

That is the story that will undo you.

Not because the others aren't damning. They are. But because this one tells people immediately what kind of institution you are and what you are capable of doing to someone with no protection. Everything else becomes context for this. Everything else confirms it.

I have given your institution every opportunity to acknowledge what you did and to self-correct. That opportunity is closing.

Acknowledge what you did. Investigate. Hold them accountable. You have no excuse for delaying this any longer.

Because when I lead with this story, people will listen. There won't be a single volunteer in Oregon who trusts you again. There won't be a single gay person who believes you'll protect them.

And there will be nothing left to manage.

In 2015, Lisa Sumption fired a manager and forced a resignation over nepotism at Oregon State Parks. Her exact words at the time: accountability is a top priority.

Eleven years later, her agency sent an unidentified man to intimidate an unpaid volunteer who documented how he was being treated. And called it accountability.

No, worse. She called it emotional processing.

Day 342.

Your man lost something sacred by participating in what you asked of him. He lost access to something he loved.

Because just like [Park Manager], just like [Program Manager], just like Lisa, just like JR, just like Stefanie, they walked into something they didn't understand.

Because they took one lying supervisor's word over actual evidence that proved it was a lie.

I'm walking that trail right now.

I feel bad for him.

Do you?

Do any of you?

You never understood what you were dealing with.

Because none of you ever looked at me as a human being.

You saw an economic unit to extract from. A volunteer with no power. Someone you could bully and intimidate into silence, into precarity, into erasure.

You could not have been more wrong.

And Lisa, what I built from $7 is proof.

You tried to abuse a Systems Architect.

Who told you he maps edges and systems.

The door is now closed for all of you.

But tell your man he is welcome on our trails. I would never want him to live without them.
