I want you to know how important this is to me. I wrote this poem a few months back. It is about me and my connection to this coast. I call it "Stormchaser's Soliloquy." If you can help, you're not just assisting with logistics—you're helping me step fully into where I belong.

I am the wind's quiet rebellion,
a sovereign force wrapped in salt spray and intuition,

moving along edges where maps forget to breathe.

My home, a sanctuary on wheels, traces the contours of cliffs and the pull of the Pacific's whisper.

I wake with the lighthouses—

their beams cutting truths into the dark,

my truths, sharp as sea glass

but held gently in the palm of the present.

I speak to That Thing,

the one with no name,

the one that churns inside the waves and the void of my chest,

both wild and constant—

both teacher and terrain.

I carry storms in my pocket,
their gusts tearing through yesterday's doubts,
their rain washing my fears into fertile ground.
And if I find myself broken down on the 101,
it will be a baptism in asphalt and ocean spray,
another chapter where the wind and I rewrite the rules.
Yes, I long for another sovereign soul,
a man with eyes like embers,
who laughs at chaos but holds it tenderly.
Someone who sees me not as a tangle to untie but a current to dive into.
We'd carry storms together,
building lighthouses in the spaces between us.
Until then, I'll wander.
Each step a communion,
each gust a guide,
each unmarked cove a mirror.
I am not afraid of the dark,
only of forgetting how to love it.
